Purpose

This guide is intended to help parents and caregivers:

1. gain knowledge of children's sexual behaviours;
2. respond appropriately to a range of developmentally appropriate and inappropriate sexual behaviours;
3. determine if the child's behaviour appears to be normal curiosity or an indication that professional help should be sought.

Introduction

It is normal for children under the age of 12 to behave in sexual ways. In fact, according to William Friedrich of the Mayo clinic, sexual behaviour in children peaks between the ages of three and six.¹ However, some sexual behaviour in children may be an indication that there is something wrong – that the child has been sexually molested, has been exposed prematurely to adult sexual knowledge, or has begun to use sexual behaviour as a way to get emotional needs met, etc.

It is important to keep in mind that there are no absolutes. Normal, healthy behaviour covers a wide range and may not be expressed the same, or to the same extent, in every child. Similarly, problem behaviour covers a range from less to more severe, and may not mean the same thing in every child.

Normal and Expected Sexual Behaviours

Most children will engage in at least some sexual behaviour before the age of 12. For very young children (four or younger) such behaviours are more likely to be engaged in openly and come to the attention of adults.²

Around age six, children develop more of a sense of privacy, such that adults are less likely to be aware of their sexual behaviour. According to William Friedrich, it is likely that sexual interest and behaviour in children continue, but as children learn cultural standards these interests are concealed.¹

A greater level of sexual interest may occur with the beginning of puberty, which ranges from age 10 to 15 for boys, and age eight to 14 for girls. The age at which puberty begins varies from child to child and is something that has changed over the past 40 to 50 years, with puberty starting six to 24 months earlier than it did for our grandparents and great-grandparents.^{3,4}

Normal sexual behaviour in children is part of how they learn about and explore the world. In this sense, it is no different from the other things that show up in their play. According to Toni Cavanagh Johnson, Ph.D., an expert in the field of children's sexual development, natural and healthy sexual exploration during childhood is: "an information gathering process wherein children explore each other's bodies by looking and touching (e.g. playing doctor), as well as explore gender roles and behaviours (e.g. playing house)."⁵

A Guide to Sexual Behaviour of Children

The information in the charts below is a way to understand children's behaviours related to sex and sexuality by age group.⁵ It is reprinted with written permission from the author, psychologist Toni Cavanagh Johnson, Ph.D.

The following charts identify sexual behaviours of children that are natural and healthy, sexual behaviours that are of concern, and sexual behaviours that require immediate consultation.

Dr. Cavanagh Johnson cautions that this guide cannot be used to determine whether or not a child has been sexually abused, and that when assessing the seriousness of a particular behaviour found within these charts, it is important to consider where the behaviour has taken place, how the behaviour was discovered, and the relationship between the children who were involved in the behaviour.

A range of sexual behaviours by age is described in each column of the following the following charts:

- Natural and Healthy – These behaviours are within the expected normal range for children of this age and developmental level. Children may engage in a few, several, or none of the behaviours.
- Of Concern – These behaviours are seen in children who are overly concerned about sex and sexuality for their age and developmental level. Consultation with a professional is recommended if a child demonstrates several of these behaviours, or if the behaviour persists in spite of interventions.
- Seek Professional Help – These behaviours require immediate consultation with a professional because they are indicative of a child who is experiencing confusion in the area of sexuality.

Responding to Children's Sexual Behaviour

Parents and caregivers may feel uncomfortable if they discover their child engaging in sexual behaviour but it is important not to overreact, shame, embarrass, or discipline the child. A parent or caregiver's reaction to a child's sexual behaviour is important for the child's well-being.

The Child Sexual Abuse Committee of the National Child Traumatic Stress Network and The Children's Assessment Center recommend that when responding to sexualized behaviour or sexualized play between children:^{2,6}

- Try to figure out what happened. To do this, it is important to stay calm. Staying calm will allow you to make clear decisions about what you say and/or do, rather than acting on strong emotions.
- Do not overreact. By staying calm and handling the situation without overreacting, children will develop a positive sense of self and sexuality.
- Remain composed. Try taking a long, deep breath, counting to ten, or even stepping away from the situation for a few minutes before saying anything. After taking a few moments to collect your thoughts, and to consult with a spouse or partner if feeling unsettled, you may then wish to speak to your child.
- Ask questions. When talking to children about sexual behaviours, it is important to maintain a calm and even tone of voice and to ask open-ended questions as much as possible. This allows for a child to tell what happened in their own words, rather than just answering yes or no. A parent might ask the child: what were you doing?, how did you get the idea?, how did you learn about this?, how did you feel about doing it?.
- Stop the behaviour. If children are masturbating in public or in front of others, explain to them that it is not appropriate to touch their private parts in public and that if they feel they need to touch their private parts they need to do it in private, hence "private parts." Children should not be told that it is "bad," "dirty," or "nasty" when found masturbating and they should not be punished. When children are exploring their sexuality with other children, parents should explain to them that when they are playing with their friends they need to leave their clothes on and that it is not okay to touch or show private parts. Parents should also ask the children if they have any questions and be available to answer any that they ask.
- Don't punish. Don't yell at or punish them. Punishing such behaviours can lead to sexual inhibitions later on and hinder a child's sexual development. Tell children that their behaviour is not appropriate by being clear and direct without making them feel guilty.
- Redirect the behaviour. Redirect the child's behaviour into a more acceptable play activity. Introduce a new game or other activities to distract their behaviour.

- Educate the child. If you encounter a situation where the child is embarrassed but otherwise not distressed, use it as an opportunity for teaching the child about healthy boundaries and rules about sexual behaviour.
- Do not ignore. Just because a behaviour is typical doesn't mean the behaviour should be ignored. When children participate in sexual behaviour it often indicates that they need to learn something. Teach what the child needs to know. For example, a parent may teach a child that it's okay to be curious about other people's bodies but that private parts should be kept private, even with friends.

If you experience a concerning situation, do not be embarrassed or afraid to seek professional help. If you have any questions about sexuality in children, or if you are concerned that a child's sexual behaviour has gone beyond what is considered natural and healthy, you can get help and advice by calling the following numbers:
